Federal False Claims Act

The objective of the federal False Claims Act (FCA) is to protect the funds and property of the federal government from fraudulent claims. A violation of the FCA occurs, with respect to Medicare, Medicaid, or other federally funded health care programs, when an individual or organization knowingly submits a false claim for payment or knowingly makes or uses a false record or statement to get a false claim paid. "Knowingly" includes having actual knowledge that a claim is false, or acting in "deliberate ignorance" or "reckless disregard" as to whether a claim is false.

The FCA provides civil penalties of $5,500 to $11,000 for each false claim, plus up to three times the amount of each false claim. The federal government receives these amounts. In addition, an individual or organization that violates the FCA is subject to exclusion from participation in federally funded health care programs.

The FCA contains provisions that allow individuals with original information (i.e., information not already the subject of legal proceedings or activities that have already been publicly disclosed) concerning fraud involving government programs to file a lawsuit on behalf of the government and, if the lawsuit is successful, to receive a portion of recoveries received by the government.

The FCA protects employees from being fired, demoted, threatened or harassed by his or her employer for filing an FCA lawsuit or providing information in good faith relative to an FCA investigation or lawsuit.

Among other prohibited activities, it is illegal under Tennessee's Medicaid false claims statute for a person to knowingly submit a false claim, or knowingly use a false record or statement, for purposes of obtaining, or attempting to obtain, Medicaid reimbursement. Violations of the statute are punishable by fines between $5,000 and $25,000 per false claim, plus an amount equal to three (3) times the payment wrongfully obtained by the false claim. Violators must also pay for the costs incurred in investigating and litigating a false claim. The State of Tennessee may file a lawsuit for a violation of the false claims statute. In addition, a private citizen may commence a qui tam action, on behalf of the citizen and the State, for a violation of the statute. The State may opt to assume responsibility for a qui tam action commenced by the private citizen, but the citizen has the right to continue as a party to the action. If the State assumes responsibility for the qui tam action, the private citizen will generally receive between 15% and 25% of the proceeds of any judgment or settlement depending upon the extent to which the citizen substantially contributed to the qui tam action. However, the private citizen will receive no more than 10% of any judgment or settlement if the court finds that the qui tam action was based primarily on publicly available information. The citizen will also receive reimbursement for reasonable expenses and reasonable attorney fees incurred in the course of pursuing the qui tam action. If the State does not assume responsibility for the qui tam action, the private citizen bringing the action will receive between 25% and 30% of the proceeds of any judgment or settlement, plus reimbursement for reasonable expenses and attorney fees. The statute prohibits an employer from retaliating against an employee because of the employee's role in investigating or prosecuting a violation of the Medicaid false claims statute. Remedies available under the statute include reinstatement with the same seniority status, two (2) times the amount of back pay, and compensation for any special damages sustained as a result of the retaliation, including reasonable litigation costs and reasonable attorneys' fees. An action under the statute must be filed within six years after the violation of the statute occurred, or three years after the violation was discovered, whichever is later (but in no event more than ten years after the violation occurred). See Tenn. Code Ann. § 71-5-181 et seq.
